From Table of Contents: "Newer ideals of peace are dynamic; if made operative will do away with war as a natural process. Of the older ideals the appeal to pity is dogmatic . The appeal to the sense of prudence also dogmatic and at this moment seems impotent. Outlook for universal peace by international arbitration. Primitive and profound impulses operate against impulse to war . . . . . Appeal to pity and prudence unnecessary if the cosmopolitan interest in human affairs is utilized . Social morality originates in social affections Emotion determines social relations in the poorer quarters of a cosmopolitan city 1 New immigrants develop phenomenal powers of association Their ideal of government includes kindness as well as protection Crowded city quarters the focal point of governmental progress . Life at these points must shape itself with reference to the demands of social justice . Simple foundations laid there for an international order Ideals formed "in the depth of anonymous life" make for realization . Impulses toward compassionate conduct imperative . The internationalism of good will foreseen by the philosopher."
